

Winter guard informs people about their teams

Karli Coleman/ Bagpiper

The winter guard team going over new parts of their show Jan. 8th, in the auxiliary gym.

By Josie Book and Sky Blessing

Ten girls run out onto the tarp holding riles and flags. They all have smiles on their faces, ready to win first place.

“Winter guard is a sport for anyone. It helps you build so many admirable traits. Anyone who is interested should come to a try out and see how they like it,” said freshman Sophie Howie.

During competitions the girls’ minds are racing fast trying to remember every detail they have to preform in the show.

Sophomore Sabrina Reynolds said that she always feels nervous and worried that she will not catch her toss, but she is always excited.

There are a lot of things to do in winter guard, and everyone has their favorite part.

“My favorite things are painting the tarp, meeting new people, and learning new tosses because when I think of winter guard, I think of all the hard work we put in and all the good friends we bring out,” said Howie.

However, other people make deeper connections in this sport.

“I became closer to my best friend during winter guard,” said freshman Mary Freiberger.

There are various reasons to try out for this sport. Some people just want to try it, while others have been doing it for years.

“I tried out because my friends told me about it and promised to do it with me,” said freshman Brianna Hall.

The memories and experiences that the winter guard team has during a season is something that will stay with them forever.

“Winter guard has impacted my life for the better because I have had good experiences, such as my first competition, and i have met good people, such as my coaches who have taught me everything i know,” said Brianna Hall.